Free Trade: Whom does it serve?

Miguel Pickard, an economist, researcher and Mexican citizen, will respond to this question during an August 25 presentation on the global economy and its effects on the human communities in countries subjected to Free Trade Agreements.

Miguel was born in Mexico City to U.S. parents and, as an adult, chose his Mexican citizenship as primary. Though he has spent his entire working life among the Mexican people through Non Governmental Organizations, he continues to be completely bi-lingual. Currently he lives in San Cristobal de las Casas in Chiapas where he founded CIEPAC (Center of Economic and Political Research for Community Action) the only organization doing research for grass-roots groups. All of this has strengthened Miguel's gift for making the global economy easy to understand and for showing how it impacts all our lives, especially people in the global south. His topics include Free Trade Agreements, labor practices and the environmental impact of transnational companies.

When: August 25, 2005 at 7:00 p.m.
